CHOICE READING.

"If you enlighten the people, do not forget that this is but half the work. Let them be made virtuous and religious, or you leave them more exposed to danger than they were before."

THE WHITE SWELLING:

OR, THE WAY IT WORKS.

CONCLUDED.

In our account some time ago of the two old sailors, we left them as they started for their voyage on the briny deep.—So after an absence of four months the good ship has returned—I hastened to see my old friends, Jack and Bill.

You recollect we left Bill in the hands of Jack who had undertaken to teach Bill the art of going a cold water voyage. So after congratulating them on their safe return, Bill gave me the following history, and as it is in his own words, you must not expect it to flourish in fine sentiments or smooth expressions. So says Bill, "after Jack had rigged me out with a plenty of clothes for the voyage, we started to go on board, for the ship was to sail that day at 2 o'clock. Jack stopped all at once, and says avast Bill, hold on a bit, there's one thing I have forgot, a little medicine will be wanted in case you get the blues, so off he starts, and returns shortly with a large hamper tied up well. "Jack what sort of medicine have you there?" "Ginger," said Jack," says I, "blood and nouns Jack I never heard that ginger was used for a medicine." Oh, said Jack, "it's a sure cure for the blue devils." So aboard we went and all hands were there, and all as sober as my friend Jack was, and that was something new for me to see, for I don't recollect ever going aboard ship before and finding all hands aboard, and all sober. So the ship cast off from the wharf and we bid adieu to our native shore. As we proceeded down the river, we had considerable labour to perform, and I soon began to hanker after the critter, but I said nothing, so after awhile I heard the pilot make a remark like this, "Captain it's very cold I'll take a little of your brandy if you've no objections." "
